The Voice That Called

"My first thought was of the super stural and for a moment I stood still, struck with the dumb terror which such a fancy causes, while the form, which had been near the mast when I first descried it, went steadily on toward the end of the om; then, as I tried to rouse myself I felt a touch upon my arm and the mate, who was then on watch, spoke to me, his face white with horror and his voice show

What do you think it is, sir? asked, fulteringly, 'I saw it come up the cabin stairs and go out there and it climbed up on the boom without seeming to need hands at all. I think Miss Alice must be dead and that's her ghost, sir.'
"At the mention of Alice's name I shook off his hand and made a leap for the boom her remark of how nice it would be to walk along the boom and jump imo the water had suddenly recurred to me and like a figst I realized that she was walking in her sleep, going out to her death in the sea, which was tossing roughly, with now and then a wave breaking over her

"I knew that my post was on deck; that I hould have been called some time since; knew that the rising wind and sen needed my presence and all my skill; I knew that a captain's first duty is to his ship; but there, ahead of me, steadily nearing the end of the boom, steadily progressing on the road which leads down to the dark valley, was is girl and no one but myself to save herind could I reach her in time?

With all the advantages of my ship train ing, with all my haste, I only gained on her slightly, and I was still some feet behind her when she stopped, poised herarms, with her fingers touching above her head, and ood thus for a moment.

'I knew she was preparing for the leap; I knew I could not reach her in time to pro cent her making it; I knew that it was an exceedingly dangerous thing to wake a sleep-walker suddenly, but no alternative was before me. "I tried to call her name aloud, to shout, to scream even, but the strong agony of the moment had deprived me of my voice and no sound came from my straining throat. Perhaps it was just as well, for if I had succeeded in waking her she would have inevitably have fallen in the terror of finding berself in such a position; she had not a steady head when awake. But I was desperate, and as she leaped far out above the water, after a glustly, awful second, in which her form was clearly shown against the dark sky by a flash of lightning so vivid that I saw even her iong eyelashes laying back ngainst her white cheek, and was so impressed with the pattern of the lace on her robe that I could draw its leaves and flowers now, I leaped, 100.

"I landed, thanks to the Providence which guards such footbardy actions, on the very end of the boom, and as she flew past me, I caught a fold of her gown. The impetus of her fall upset my balance, and we both fell, but in falling I managed to grasp the boom, and there we awang, I olding on to life with one hand, she chaped in my other arm.

The shock awakened her, and, beside herself with terror at her unknown position, she struggled madly and strove to free herself from my embrace, while scream after scream scored the men on deck until all thought of duty was forgot ten and the ship was practically unmanned.

"Sailors are Invariably superstitious, and not a few of them really thought that the white form was a ghost, and that the screams were nune, as I was carried off to the hell which is supposed to await those who meddle with the spirits from another

'All this I was dimly conscious of, to gether with a vague fear that in saving Ahce thus I was dooming us all to drown, est those throughts were but an undercorrect to the horror of that struggle with the fearmaddened giri, whose resisting, clinging, are cold hands were slowly loosening by old and pulling us both down to death in

"At last, after perhaps a minute, which seemed to me an elemity, I grew desperate, and, finding that I was still voiceless and could not reassure her, I drew her closely to me, squeezed her frail form until she ceased to struggle, then pressing my chin to the hollow of her throat, I completed the work of allencing her. She grew rigid, her arms fell imply down, one of them striking my face a gentle blow in its sudden descent, and the next lightning flash showed me that she had fainted. "With a great sigh of thankfulness, min-gled with a curse that I had been forced to hus hurt her in order to save her. I began to vork my way toward the ship. God only nows how, with my one free hand, stiff with fatigue, and growing useless with the long strain, until ist as I was giving up in lespair and thinking bitterly that I should e compelled to let go and drop back into the seething water, I feit a rope, seized it, and somehow by the aid of that Power which watches over us, and which we all neglect save in times of distress, drew myself up onto the boom, and ching there breathless, exhausted, but saved.

"But I shall never forget the agony of that noment when I thought I must let go. Thoughts of my disgraced memory as a man who had left his ship to sink while be followed a phantom, mingled with regrets that I had hurt Alice instead of letting her die more easily, and a wild longing to bid my mother good-by, made me face death with a soul filled with bitterness and a heart trained with grief.

"Once my breath had returned, I was and with a mighty effort I struggled to my es, made my way along the boom, bruised and beaten by its wild swaying, and finally faced the demoralized crew with shaking misal-to St. Elizabeth's.

"At sight of me appearing before them strank back, and one dished down to his back. But here my voice came back to me, and I think the strong objurgation I yelled after him did more to reassare the rest than anything else which I could have done.

Turning to the mate, who stood by speechess with miregled shame and fear, I delivcred the familiag girl to him, telling him to arry her below, rouse her mother and reare as quickly as possible, and then, bare footed and bull-clothed as I was, I forget all else for the time being in thinking of the ship, which was running madely before the wind and taking in more water than she ould carry safely for long.

The storm which was upon us was one of the worst I ever so w-and I have been in asnya wild storm—and it was two days and a night later before I could find time to go ow and ask ofter Alice, although through all my anxiety and exhausting labor I white, still fave as it had lain against my breast after I had choked her into uncon-ciousness haunted me the whole time.

"When at last the storm abased and I felt see to leave the ship in the care of the mate, who had been completely upset by his scare and the remorse which followed it, I was almost light-headed and the fancy that remail, cold, clinging fingers were always wiling at my army, holding me back from my duty, nearly maddened me. When I got below her mother told me that

Alice was very ill, had been wildly delirious for twenty-four hours after that dreadful shock, but was, she hoped, beyond danger now, and she even allowed me to see her for a moment as she lay in her berth, thrown
